To the Members of the Class of 1910:

In this First Class Report now submitted to you is included in so far as is possible an accurate and detailed account of the Class during its four years of College.

The numerous sides, social, academic and athletic, of our life in Cambridge are brought out by the various sets of statistics compiled from the otherwise passive "Class Lives," the speeches on Class Day and Commencement, the reports of athletic contests both intra and inter-collegiate, and the list of present addresses and occupations of the members of the Class.

In examining these statistics you may find that you are credited with being a charter member of the Circolo Italiano while truth may show that you were throughout your course an earnest and ardent supporter of the Deutscher Verein—you may also find that you rowed 6 on a crew the existence of which you never knew of, but errors are bound to occur in most reports—and this report will in all probability not be an exception to the rule.

By this mention of the possibility of error I do not wish to detract from the careful and intelligent work in the preparation of the Report done by Adolphus Terry. The Class also owes thanks to the College Office for kindness in giving information, to the Crimson for use of their files, to Messrs. McCarter & Kneeland of the Crimson Printing Company for their care in preparation of the Report and last but not least to President Lowell for the Baccalaureate Sermon.

In the preparation of such a Report it is the custom to follow as closely as practicable the form of previous years, and I have found the 1909 Report very satisfactory in general nature—and have included, as in that Report, extracts from certain “Class Lives”—to give the views of some of the Class on topics of common interest.

Finally, in closing, let me add the request that members of the Class should keep me posted as to changes in address, occupation and also notify me at once of marriages or births. It is only by individual responsibility in notifying the secretary that the organization of the Class becomes at all effective.

CLARENCE C. LITTLE.

On August 1, 1910, your Treasurer purchased one American Telephone and Telegraph Company Collateral Trust bond (denomination $1,000.00), at 89 1-2 plus interest and commission. It will be necessary in the near future to make a loan to the Photograph Committee that they may settle their outstanding accounts, this loan to be repaid by the sale of Albums now on hand.

The very high cost of the Senior Picnic was due to the refusal of the owners of Peddocks Island to allow us to land there after all the arrangements had been completed, and also to the damage done the Riverside Recreation Grounds during the day.

Respectively submitted,

PHILIP WYMAN, Treasurer.

COMMENTS FROM THE CLASS

“More care, should, I think, be paid to the choice and supervision of the younger and less important officers of instruction. The profession of teaching is not represented at Harvard in its most attractive aspect. The remedy I think lies in more careful attention to the filling of the teaching positions, and in making these positions more attractive by raising the standard of the occupants.”

“I think that the idea of a degree with distinction should be advertised more. Freshmen should be informed that such things exist and, therefore, they may begin at once to work for them. A mid-week meeting of English A could well be devoted to such a purpose.”

“One thing that I am very anxious to see is the further extension of the influence of the University into distant parts of the country, especially the West, where Harvard is still held somewhat in contempt by a certain set of people. It is these false ideas which should be and are being uprooted by the graduates.”

“There is in a word a certain coldness about Harvard men which is entirely unnecessary. There is an indescribable atmosphere about Harvard College which makes a man almost afraid to address another who he is certain is in the College.”

“My last suggestion is that a more systematic distribution of thesis work be made. Today many courses have theses due at the same time—especially at the end of each term. This results in hasty and slovenly work. It could be very easily arranged that courses in the same group did not require thesis work at the same time of year.

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

“So this is Harvard! I had thought
Of golden chasings finely wrought,
Precious with gems which could be bought
By four years’ work—an élite place,
Rare formal, full of that grace
Which comes with surface, silks and lace.

“It is not so—this Harvard that I know,
It is my love; it is the friendly light
That blazes out my future through the night,
It is the light which glorifies my face,
It is the strength which holds my heart in place.”

“It would furthermore be a rather good idea for men to be sent to the various schools preparing for Harvard to advise incoming Freshmen, even before they get to College, on certain matters relating to rooms, etc., before it is too late and the new men have already engaged rooms at places which a year from then they will regret having chosen.”

“A higher sense of honor among the undergraduates is needed more at Harvard than any other thing at present (not excluding a new gymnasium).

“The reason men keep on taking books from libraries, or tearing pages out of books for other people’s use as well as their own, the reason why men do not hesitate to hand in other men’s theses signed with their own name, the reason why men get other men to sit in their seats to prevent being marked absent, the reason they will read off another man’s paper in a test or even out and out “cribb” in an examination, is the same in each case. Because the rest of the undergraduates, or a large majority of the rest, do not think any the less of a man for doing one of these things. More often than not deceitful methods are merely considered clever or amusing. Harvard needs a sense of Honor. How can it be obtained?”

“The system of marking might profitably be made more uniform. In some courses A means perfection or genius; in others it means ability to consume detail and retain it; in others it is indefinite and not even the professors have an accurate idea of its meaning."

"I also think that the eligibility rules of athletics should be changed. The present "three year" rule should be made to read to the effect that persons graduating in three years and going to a graduate school should be allowed to compete during their first year in the graduate school."

"I would suggest more frequent examinations at Harvard, the present system of mid-year and finals and hour-examinations tend to produce successive periods of laziness followed by spasmodic periods of intense application. The result is that the knowledge is not properly digested and habits of continuous studiousness not developed. . . . The conclusion is clear: less liberty, more supervision."

"In every community "snobs" are bound to exist, and they are not present in any greater number at Harvard than in many other places. Only they are expected, sought for, and found, every blessed one of them by men who take such people seriously. I know of no more thoroughly trivial person than a "snob" unless it be the ultra-sensitive person who expects snobbishness from every one he meets."

"I should favor the departing from the formal lecture system as much as is feasible, where the size of the course permits it; and make the lecture a discussion between the professor and students. In this way many points are often cleared up which would be forever unexplained unless the student is able on the spot to formulate in his own mind his view of the subject and then have it corrected. . . . I think these views apply more particularly to the engineering and economics courses, and other courses in the practical subjects, as it is to these that I have confined my work."

"Within late years athletics have come to occupy a more and more important place among college activities. At certain times and among certain classes of persons they have become the only thought, the only aim and ambition. There are fellows on the various teams who care little about their College standing as long as they stand high on the list as athletes of prominence. This is not generally true, to be sure, but there are sufficient instances of it to bring down the censure of the Faculty, to give the advocates of a restriction of athletics a strong, sound argument, and thus to cast odium on athletics as a whole."

"The first weakness in our system it seems to me, is the fact that we are trying to achieve the impossible in expecting a large class of 700 men to consider themselves as a unit, men of all classes, nationalities, and ideas. The modern class is too unwieldy to act as a unit. Our fathers knew all their classmates with some degree of intimacy and have naturally always thought of their classmates as a large club. How many of our classmates do we know? Perhaps a quarter of the whole number. Are we going to have the same feeling towards our class as our fathers had? Won't the day come when we shall meet some famous man who will tell us that he was in the class of 1910 in Harvard and we shall have to confess that we never knew of his existence? There are hundreds of men who never make their way to the front in College because they don't happen to be taken up. Why is it that such a thing is possible? Isn't it because the typical undergraduate will turn to the obvious rather than to search for the obscure? In other words doesn't it mean the class is so big that many of the best men may be hidden throughout their undergraduate days? If some residential divisions were introduced, on the other hand, wouldn't it be possible to create a feeling resembling that of the Oxford man for his college. For instance, suppose that every dormitory were to have its own athletic teams, its own instructors its own officers, would it not create a real feeling of fellowship between a considerable number of men? The unwieldiness of the class and the exclusiveness of the club would alike be avoided."

"I leave Harvard standing facing a new way. The old Harvard is no more with the coming of the new grouping of studies and the plans for the Freshman dormitories. I have no time to express myself carefully but will nevertheless endeavor to make myself clear. In the first place segregation and compulsory work means to my mind the loss of individuality in individuals. It means that Harvard men will be generally students and very scarcely scholars, and that very state of things already exists in all American scholars and is doing inestimable harm in this country. Before this phase of college developed, there were it is certain very few students here, but the proportion of scholars and thinkers was far beyond that of any New World University. The present day world seems to demand that we turn out a great quantity of educated men and not a small number of permanent leaders. I think that this is a tremendous error. My conception of Harvard is a place where a few great geniuses issue forth every year and where the rest of mankind is touched and illumined by their light. When you strengthen the middle class you do away with the lower stratum, but you pull down the upper layer also. And so Harvard goes the way of the State Universities and of Princeton and Yale, the business of creating the commonplace. We who were wont alone to make giants and weaklings, now are to make mere men."

"The new requirements in the choice of electives will make competition more keen. Individuality will not wane but like partly confined fire burn more furiously. This confinement is not sufficient to kill individuality—few are. For individuality is methods not matter and what difference whether we design our own palaces or plough another man's field the individual will shine through his occupation and make it beautiful."

"Harvard, I think, lacks a good general introductory course to Science. Now adays, every educated man ought to know the elements of Chemistry, Physics, Biology, Astronomy, Geology, etc., but a student at Harvard if he wishes to know something of these subjects would have to devote about half of his elective work to them."

BACCALAUREATE SERMON

TO THE CLASS OF 1910

PRESIDENT ABBOTT LAWRENCE LOWELL

“Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him, until the breaking of the day.

“And he said, ‘Let me go, for the day breaketh’; and he said, ‘I will not let thee go until thou bless me.’”

GEN. 32, 24-29.

In the graphic chapters in which the Jewish writers sketched the life of the founder of their race we are told of two dreams or visions that left deep traces on his mind. One of them came to him when he first left his father's home, and went forth into the world to seek his fortune. As he slept upon the ground he dreamt that God appeared to him, assured him of his protection, and promised him prosperity. There is a note of youthful buoyancy about him, a tone of confidence as he seeks to make a compact with the Almighty about the future. The second vision came when he journeyed back years later, bringing with him the flocks and herds he had acquired, but uncertain whether he would not after all be ruined by the vengeance of Esau. He came to him as a mature man, on the night before what he feared might be the crisis of his life. He spent the long hours wrestling, as he believed, with destiny, and would not let it go until it blessed him at the breaking of the day.

In the present age we search diligently for the causes of all things, we strive to attribute all results to the operation of definite laws, and in applying the principle to human relations we hear much of the effect of environment upon a man's career. He is the product of the time in which he lives, of the people among whom he dwells. He is a creature of suggestion, and the suggestions come from the world about him, and from the comrades with whom he associates. By the law of his being he imitates what others do; and he is constrained to win his livelihood in accord with the customs that prevail in his community. In all this there is much that is sound and of grave import; but it is also true that a man creates to a great extent his own environment. He is not affected equally by everything that surrounds him. He is mainly influenced by, and, conversely his personality reacts upon, those things of which he is conscious, which he perceives. The world has many aspects, and no man sees them all. No two men see precisely the same aspect, and therefore no two men have precisely the same environment or live in exactly the same world. Every one perceives chiefly the things to which he pays attention, and again he pays attention to the things in which he is interested, about which he cares.

If a number of men walk through a strange country, one of them may observe the trees and plants, another the birds, a third the tracks of wild animals, a fourth the possibilities of agriculture, a fifth the roads and buildings, while a sixth may see little or nothing of any value. Some of them may be impressed by the good qualities of the people, others by their disagreeable traits. Each of these men has virtually travelled in a different land which is not, indeed, created by his own thoughts, but is brought to his notice thereby; and what each of them has seen goes to form his opinions and thus affects his future conduct. But if a man is moulded, if his destiny is shaped, by the world in which he lives, and if in large measure he frames that world for himself, by the nature and intensity of his own interests, it is obviously important that he should frame the right kind of a world. This is not merely a question of the temperament with which he happens to have been born, for his world is made in large part by his aspirations, and by his persistence in maintaining them.

No doubt men are not in fact born either free or equal. They cannot do what they wish; their opportunities are diversely circumscribed; their natural capacities, their bodily and mental vigor, vary enormously; and yet when one has passed middle life, and looks back on the people he has known, he may well feel that the limits on freedom of action, and the inequalities of natural gifts, have been less decisive factors than he might have supposed. The differences in men's careers are often based not so much on the opportunities they have had, as upon the use they have made of them. A man is, indeed, often quite ignorant of the chances that have passed by him unobserved. We go through much of life like the young man journeying to the city to seek his fortune. In the heat of the day he lay down by the roadside and fell asleep. While he slept there two thieves who espied him proposed to kill and rob him, but reflecting that he was probably penniless went their way. Shortly afterwards a rich merchant passed by, and struck by the young man's appearance thought of offering him a position in his business, but realizing that he knew nothing of the youth's antecedents checked his impulse and rode on. The young man awoke and pursued his journey, unconscious that he had been close to death and to good fortune. Too often a man lets his opportunities slip away, through timidity, prejudice, or the blindness of inertia.

But after all the most important factor in shaping men's careers is commonly a difference in standards; and that means a difference in the objects for which they really care. I have a shrewd friend who has always insisted that, as a rule, men accomplish whatever they desire intensely. Men differ amazingly in the standards they keep before their eyes. Many men seem to care chiefly for amassing wealth; others for fame or professional success; a few for power; and some merely for ease and comfort, or even for display. I have sometimes been shocked to hear a man declare—not always I trust with perfect sincerity—that if he could accumulate a tolerable fortune by his profession or business he would retire, apparently to do nothing of any consequence. If he meant to devote himself to public service, or to those charitable institutions for the general welfare in which much of the best public work is done in our community, well and good. There is no more noble form of life, provided the motive be a desire to do good and not a craving for power or a passion for the acclamations of the crowd. If popular government gives to every man the privilege of serving his country, it also imposes on him the duty of doing so, as far as his circumstances will permit. Every man in America is bound to take at least an intelligent interest in public affairs, and to bear a part of the burden of government either in office or out. He ought to perform with eagerness his duties as a citizen, and make personal sacrifices to check iniquity and promote honest, efficient administration and pure politics.

But few men are in a position to devote the greater part of their energies directly to the service of the state. Most people must perforce spend by far the larger portion of their time on their profession, business or occupation; and their main influence upon the world for good or evil must be wrought out through, or in connection with, the effort to support themselves. Let us not, therefore, think of that influence as small or ignoble. We are altogether too much in the habit of separating life into two fractions which we regard as selfish and generous. If a man who liberally gives of his wealth and his time to beneficent objects, says in his office "business is business, and although the ten commandments are followed here, the golden rule is not," to what extent dwelleth the love of God in him? Life is an integral whole, and by means of that which fills the greater part of it must a man's chief good in the world be done. Some years ago in a cemetery at Bologna I remember the custodian smiling contemptuously at the gravestone of a wheelwright which bore a bas-relief of a carriage spring. Probably an improvement in springs of this kind had been that man's chief contribution to the well-being of his community; and it may well have been a notable contribution. Certainly it was not a matter for ridicule that his family should record the fact over his grave; and it is perhaps unfortunate that on account of a dogmatic controversy the words "and their works do follow them" were omitted from the burial service of the Church of England. False shame about a man's trade has not always prevailed. One of the largest ancient tombs close by the walls of Rome is that of a baker, and it displays the implements of his craft.

Let every man remember that the work he does, albeit for the immediate sake of gain, shall rise up in judgment against him. If he conducts it without regard to the rights of others, or the welfare of the public; if he needlessly crush those weaker than he, or defraud the ignorant who have no eyes to see, or no spokesman to defend them; then he has done a wrong which gold will not efface.

Moreover, if he has done the work that falls to his hand only fairly well, he is an unprofitable servant. He is living not, indeed, with a bad, but with a low, standard. Too many men are satisfied with mediocrity when the standard they ought to set up for themselves should be nothing short of excellence. I think it was Lamartine who, in speaking of the life-long work of Palissy, the potter, said that it was like that of every profession which has labor for its means, progress for its object, and God for its end. You may recall how, in "Trilby," Du Maurier makes the French sculptor Durieu say, "I'm very much afraid He does not really exist, le bon Dieu! Most unfortunately for me, for I adore Him! I never do a piece of work without thinking how nice it would be if I could only please Him with it." Few men achieve success worth having unless, by whatever name they call it, they are moved by a spirit of this kind. The only true standard is that of eternal perfection, and we must keep it ever before our eyes, however small in scope the work we actually do, and however feeble our capacity to approach the ideal.

If by success in life we mean attaining the goal of ambition, then success comes only to those whose standards are low; for the higher a man's standard, the more lofty his aim, the farther will he always be from reaching it. What gives life its value is not the accomplishment of a result that is moderately good, but the effort to do something as well as it can be done, and the man who strives for that will go much farther than he who fixes his gaze upon a lower point. But you will say, if a man sets his hopes beyond what he can attain, he can never be happy, because he can never have the satisfaction of reaching it. Let us not deceive ourselves. If the pursuit of happiness is one of the rights of man, it is in itself the least remunerative of occupations. Happiness is not found by hunting it, but in the course of a search for something else. It is not the aim, but a by-product, of a happy life. No scheme of philosophy can escape the eternal ethical paradox. No rational system of morality can be framed which teaches that by doing right we shall bring permanent misery upon ourselves; that the good are doomed to grief, and the bad is pleasure—such a doctrine would shock our moral sense of justice. Every system of ethics must assume that the performance of duty brings happiness in this life or in another; and yet if the desire for happiness is the direct motive for conduct it has no moral value. A religion that is worthy of the name proclaims that it is the duty of every man to strive, in complete self-sacrifice, with all his heart, with all his soul, with all his mind and with all his strength for the Kingdom of God, which is the working together of all things for the perfect good; and it tells him to have faith that if he does so happiness will in some way come in the end. But the means are not to be neglected for the ends. If we must keep our eyes fixed upon the stars to know our course aright, we must also look at the road we travel lest we stumble and fall by the way. Many people who start out with bright hopes become discouraged, and after what seems a fruitless struggle, give up the fight, or settle down to be content with far less than they had at first desired. Young men often expect success to come too easily. They do not realize the importance in all life's ventures of the power of work. They do not appreciate the necessity, in every career, of intense, continuous, accurate labor, and even of drudgery. Work of that kind is not only needed for headway in any pursuit, but it often makes up for defects in more brilliant gifts. Among the half-truths that pass for proverbs is the saying that genius is a capacity for taking infinite pains. It is not true in the sense that great results can be wrought without imagination, but on the other hand imagination without hard work is usually barren; and, what is more, the higher the imagination the greater the amount of work required to bring its full fruition. In reading history we are amazed by a genius, a soldier it may be or a statesman, who by one act, almost in a flash, seems to turn the current of events and achieve a lasting victory. It seems the inspiration of a moment, until by a study of details we learn with what laborious forethought, with what abundant care, he prepared the conditions that secured the best chance of a favorable issue.

Moreover the unpremeditated act of a moment may be the result of years of mental preparation. We admire the hero who, on sudden peril at great personal risk or sacrifice, does a courageous thing, and saves the lives of others. Is it a mere accident that he did so? Is it a mere chance that he found himself in a position where anyone else would have done the same? If so, he deserves no special praise, for the action is no test of character, but solely the sport of fortune. It is not so, because the quick reaction of his mind is usually the consequence of long discipline of character. Deliberately or unconsciously he has schooled himself to self-restraint or noble thought, and when the emergency comes his nature responds at once to the call. If you know him well you know how he would act. Adventures are to the adventurers, heroic acts fall to the lot of heroes, for sudden daring is a test of quality long trained. Young men are prone to underestimate the value of hard work. They are apt, also, to look for success too quickly and too certainly. Everyone with high aspirations encounters delays, disappointments, and often, for a time, failure; and the differences in men lie in great part in their tenacity in resisting discouragement, or in their resourcefulness in taking a fresh path when the first one has proved delusive. Destiny is mysterious, baffling; yet if pursued relentlessly may lead to success in directions unforeseen, and not designed at the outset; but it does not bless a man unless he wrestle with it until the breaking of the day.

BACCALAUREATE HYMN

EDWARD THOMAS EYRE HUNT.

(Tune: The Son of God Goes Forth to War.)

O Light of all, we offer Thee
Our gifts of praise and prayer:
Thy hand has brought us lovingly
Through paths of cloistered care.
Keep from us faith in what is dust
And fear of what is strange,
And grant us evermore to trust
The change beyond the change.

If blind with light of victory
Impatiently we live,
Grant us the gift of charity;
And if we fail, forgive.
And when night overcomes at length
The flaming torch of youth,
Beyond the shadows give us strength
To see the changeless Truth.

CLASS ORATION

WILLIAM RICHARD OHLER.

To the person who knows anything about the history of Harvard there can be nothing new in such a subject as "Harvard and the Community." In the early days Harvard was so much a part of the community that a history of the college is in many respects a history of the state. Harvard College was a child of the state. She was supported by gifts not only from the general court but from the people. In return for this support the community looked to Harvard to supply ministers for the church. To us this seems a narrow field of service, but it must be remembered that the ministry represented practically the only learned profession of the time.

During the years which elapsed between the early days, the days of Leverett and Kirkland, and the time of the Civil War, changes in the attitude of college and community toward each other were, of course, inevitable. There were many people in the community who had no interest in Harvard. On the other hand Harvard's connection with one particular religious body and with the state, connections which lasted until 1843 and 1865 respectively, prevented her from keeping pace with the broadened opportunities opened to educated men. To a large extent the college was looked upon as a place in which to receive a cultured training, but a training which had little or no direct connection with the everyday life of the community. Despite the fact that during these years Harvard can boast of such men as Adams, Hancock, Gerry, Trumbull, Quincy, Channing, Holmes, Sumner, Phillips and Lowell, educated men in general held themselves aloof from participation in matters of public interest. The stirring times just preceding the Civil War mark a break, however, in this attitude. In and about Boston Harvard men were among the leaders in the agitation of public questions. And when the war broke forth Harvard men from every part of the country responded to the call for service. Our Alma Mater gave liberally of her sons for both sides and throughout the great struggle brother could be found fighting against brother.

It took many years, however, for the real meaning of this heroic sacrifice to make itself felt. At Harvard as well as at other educational institutions men were slow to connect education with the responsibility of service to the country. In 1870 at a mass meeting of students in Massachusetts Hall Tom Hughes of England expressed his surprise at finding how little interest college men took in the life of the great Republic, and called upon the men to follow the example of University men in England and to consecrate themselves to public service. Later, in 1881, Wendell Phillips in his stirring speech on "The Educated Man in a Republic" told educated men that they failed in the republican duty unless they took the lead in the agitation of the great social and political problems of the day. As the material and industrial life of the nation grew, and as there was a corresponding growth in the demand of public service, Harvard's response to the spirit of these words became more and more generous. Clearer and clearer grew the vision that only through unselfish public service could men justly commemorate the death of their comrades on the field of battle. And it is to Harvard's everlasting glory that today Harvard men may be found in every walk of life, giving of their best to the needs of the community. These men are living memorials to the men who in times of war laid down their lives; they too have responded to the nation's call for service and they have responded with the loyalty of true Harvard men.

The age in which we at present are living makes even greater demands upon the services of educated men. Ours is a time of industrial expansion and of industrial struggle. No longer can we concern ourselves with our own development: we must consider the development of the whole community. Men and women everywhere, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, are trying to interpret and to ameliorate conditions of social life. In this absorbing problem the college has a great opportunity and an even greater responsibility.

The country is asking of us college men not how much we know but how much are we worth to the community. And the country expects not alone willingness in public service, but efficiency as well. Knowledge and service are thus united and the test of a liberal education becomes the ability to serve better the community in which we may live.

Surely there are few really educated persons who will not admit that such a test is thoroughly in accordance with the spirit of the age. Moreover, it is a test applied by the community not only to college graduates and students but to colleges themselves as educational centres. One of the great issues of our day is the demand which the common people are making for a share in the government and in the wealth and also in the educational privileges of the nation. More and more are educational institutions coming to realize their obligations in this respect. A strong feature of Harvard's policy during the last decade has been the sincere attempt to extend the usefulness of the college. As indications of this, we have the service rendered the community through the free clinics at both the Medical and Dental Schools, and through the work of the Bussey Institution in supplying the state with pure antitoxins with which to combat contagious diseases. Furthermore, there is the service which Harvard is giving the community from the extension of her educational privileges beyond the college. The Lowell Institute courses, the Summer School, and Radcliffe College are examples of this policy of extension. The culmination of this work has just recently been reached in the creation of the so-called University Extension Movement which unites Boston University, Technology, Tufts, Boston College, Wellesley, Simmons, The Boston Museum of Fine Arts and Harvard, under a policy of systematic and efficient education extension. As a result of this movement many of the advantages of a college education are going to be placed within reach of teachers, who never had the opportunities of college work, clerks, draftsmen and bookkeepers who desire a general education, and the boy of genius who needs only the start to make himself known.

It is bound to be a source of future gratification to all

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

Harvard's friends that in this field of community service Harvard is pursuing such a broad-minded policy. For the future of Harvard, like the future of every educational institution, must in the long run be determined by the usefulness of the institution to the state or community. The narrow margin by which the college taxation bill was defeated last fall, and the critical financial condition in which Harvard would be placed were such a bill to become a law, are considerations which cause us to realize the seriousness of the problem. Harvard's only defence against such a misfortune is her sincerity in serving the state. Once a state sees that educational institutions are doing their part and are giving of their best to the community then surely no enlightened state will place any barriers in the way.

But this problem of community service is one which does not alone concern the University as an institution. In the question asked today—of what use is Harvard to the community—people refer not only to Harvard as an institution but also to Harvard students. Every loyal Harvard undergraduate, therefore, owes a direct debt of service to the community about him. This responsibility falls upon a man the moment he is connected with the name of Harvard. And no thoughtful student can long fail to see that in his attitude toward this responsibility there can be no neutral ground. Either he is upholding the hands of Harvard by making more secure her position in the community or he is undermining the very foundations upon which her future existence depends.

The first thing which a critical public looks for in a college man is efficiency. If Harvard men lack this they cannot give large service to the community and they fail to justify the existence of Harvard herself. Therefore the undergraduate can render no greater service to Harvard and through her to the community than by conducting himself as a thorough, serious minded student. This service becomes all the more important now that we are beginning to realize the connection between work in college and efficiency in after life. The work of the "Faculty Committee on Rank" shows that only about seven per cent. of the men who receive an average college grade of C- or lower receive a cum laude in the Law School. And after taking into consideration the greater number of cum laudes given in the Medical School, practically the same figures apply for that department as well. Inasmuch as scholarship men in both the Law and Medical Schools as a rule receive the best positions in their respective professions the connection between serious work in college and efficiency in after life is at once apparent.

Furthermore, Harvard as an institution can give her best service to the community only when college and people are in harmony with each other. Unfortunately, Harvard is in this respect at the mercy of the undergraduate. No matter how petty undergraduate offenses may be they tend to arouse ill feeling among the people about us, and cause Harvard to be misjudged and misunderstood not only in this community but often throughout the country. If, then, Harvard students really love their Alma Mater with a love which means more than support for athletic teams, every man will do his part to see that in the numerous ways in which community and college come in contact Harvard shall never in any respect be the offender.

Although service to Harvard both in the capacity of a serious student and a law-abiding citizen is the first duty which the undergraduate owes to the community, this in no way excuses him from taking part in the many opportunities for a more direct community service. In general the opportunities for such service are to be found in two main fields of work, political and social.

No thoughtful Harvard undergraduate who has any interest whatsoever in public questions of the day can be blind to the need of the country for strong men to direct her political affairs. Not only are capable men needed in office, but also they are needed in the various branches of political research. Such problems as taxation and municipal accounting represent fields of political activity which are far from being overcrowded. In these various kinds of service the nation expects the college-bred man to take a leading position. Now future political efficiency depends largely upon present-day training. Opportunities for actual political work in and about Cambridge merit, therefore, the hearty support of all students interested in political problems. When directed toward good government such work serves to strengthen the chain which is drawing college and community closer together.

Aside from political work there is the work which Harvard men can do in the great fields of social service. The value which such work can have on the life of the nation is almost without measure. For real social service work comes not alone in providing an evening's entertainment for a crowd of boys in the South End but in teaching these same boys habits of right conduct and in encouraging them to become successful and useful citizens; not alone in keeping a club of young immigrants from tearing down the clubhouse, but in teaching these immigrant boys and also their fathers how to read and write the English language and how to understand our American institutions, such work demands real men, men who have the serious purpose of lifting up those with whom they come in contact.

Furthermore, social service work is essentially a reciprocal process. We also have something to learn. First of all we learn a lesson in democracy—how to appreciate and to respect another's point of view. Moreover, we learn actual life: we learn how to deal with people who are engaged in the real, intense struggle for existence—how to understand and appreciate men and women who are the human particles of such problems as socialism, labor, and immigration. As a result we are bound to become resourceful, sympathetic, and tactful. Participation by college men in the various forms of community service, whether political or social, serves in a large measure to bridge over the chasm which otherwise exists between the college and the outside world; it helps make our entrance into future service a logical and natural development.

It lies within the power of every Harvard undergraduate to take some share in these various forms of service which Harvard owes to the community. There is no reason why every man should not apply himself seriously to college work, and why he should not behave at all times as a law-abiding citizen. And, there is little reason why every student should not, some time in his college course, take some part in a more direct community service. We tend in our undergraduate life to place so much emphasis on the worship of club men, and the development of social prestige, that many men seem to forget the claims of scholarship and their duty not only to the community but in many respects their duty as social beings to their fellow students. We like to think of Harvard as a place where the truth is sought after and where a man is respected for what he really is,—for shame then, that any Harvard man, no matter what his connections, should let social ambitions keep him from acting at all times as an ordinary individual. For the sake of Harvard's future may we soon see the advent of an undergraduate opinion which shall desire no man fit for social honor unless he possesses the seriousness of the student and the broadmindedness of one who is in sympathy with the needs of the country; an opinion which shall deem probation a disgrace, an opinion which in judging men shall be courageous enough to go beneath any social exteriors to the man himself.

As members of the Senior class we still have many opportunities to influence undergraduate life. Through our different preparatory schools, as students in some graduate department, in our life in the community, we shall come in contact with both present and future undergraduates. It is our duty to encourage undergraduate effort in the various forms of direct community service and to support the work which President Lowell is doing to improve intellectual and social conditions in the college. Thus are we doing our part to create a more thoughtful undergraduate body and to make the community feel that the country is safe in the hands of college men.

Our greatest opportunity for service, however, comes in our relation to the community at large. What is to be our attitude toward the world in which our life work will call us? Are we going to think only of ourselves and our own success without regard to the life of those about us? Are we going to spend our lives in luxurious idleness, indifferent to the needs of our country? No, if Harvard has taught us anything at all it must be that the needs of the community always should have a prominent place in our interests. We are not beyond the time when we can engage in social service work. In New York City splendid work is being done by an organization composed entirely of young college graduates. Other cities offer opportunities just as great. We shall be called upon to help in the fight for good government and for better business conditions, to help support the work of the church and kindred organizations, to help exterminate vice and its attendant suffering. Many of these problems involve personal questions—questions which must be settled in the quiet of our own lives. Of this much, however, we can be sure, both our country and our Alma Mater are in need of men who are champions of the right. Many of these problems involve co-operation with other men. May it never be said of us as Harvard men that we are too individualistic, that we have too high an opinion of our own ideas to be able to work with others. Rather may it always be said that we are striving to develop in our lives a character which, when occasion demands, has either the courage to stand alone or the courage to put aside personal views for the good of the whole. In citizenship there can be no neutrality, either we are for our country or against her, either we stand out squarely for the right or we give our support to the wrong.

As Harvard men we are called upon to strengthen the name of Harvard throughout the country. In this laudable ambition may we never forget that the finest service we can render our Alma Mater is through service to the community. Fortunately, Harvard has not lacked in men who possess this high degree of loyalty. Of the many such men who could be named no man has served Harvard better in this respect than ex-President Eliot. Never can it be said of him that he placed Harvard before the community. Always his first service was to the public, and who can say that Harvard's position in the nation has not grown under his guidance? Equally fortunate are we to have in President Lowell a man who in like measure has caught the vision of Harvard's place in the nation. Himself a man of affairs, President Lowell is bent upon uniting Harvard, in every way possible, with the life of the country.

Today Harvard stands in a critical position. In a large measure the next few years will determine whether Harvard is to maintain her place as the foremost American university or whether through lack of funds and other support she is to give place to richer and newer institutions. Every member of the class of 1910 can help answer this question. The country judges Harvard through her sons. Harvard needs our gifts but she needs greater our influence as public servants. Once Harvard has become a national institution, once her life has become ingrafted in the life of the nation, she need never want in financial support. In whatever community we may be called, therefore, and whatever positions we may fill, whether positions of great responsibility or the humbler places of everyday life, may we always give unselfish, uplifting service to the people about us. May we always remember that the life which will cause our Alma Mater the greatest pleasure and pride is the life lived in the service of the community. In the days to come when we shall meet again in the great highways of life and shall grasp each other by the hand, may it always be with the mutual feeling that the people of this world are better, stronger and happier for our having lived among them as Harvard men.

CLASS POEM

EDWARD THOMAS EYRE HUNT.

Up from the valleys and over the hills
And on and on to the mountain height
The highways beckon, and morning thrills
Youth with a new delight...

Out in the morning men go by,
Cheerily, wearily, swift or slow—
Into the morning you and I
Fling wide the gates, and go...

Who would falter for doubts or fears?
Who would linger an hour to-day?
Into the light of the years—the years—
Up, and out, and away!

But here...to-day...how sweet it seems
To sit in silence on the verge
Of fact and fancy-foolish dreams,
Where past and future merge.

To find among the golden hours
That lift like faces from the past,
Vague hints as of forgotten flowers
And songs that faded fast

But left a mocking memory,
Elusive, pale, and bitter-sweet,
Of deeds that never are to be,
Of passions incomplete.

On sweeps the swift processional.
Blithe boyish faces, now they seem
To pass demure from hall to hall
Or loiter, as in a dream,

CLASS POEM

Alone on the elm-shaded grass,
To watch where certain figures come
Whose presence somehow as they pass
Seems like a breath from home.

Now faces browned by autumn suns
And bright with new-made comradeships;
Full of new joy that overruns
The portals of their lips.

Now from the thronging faces leap
Athletic figures to the fore,
And from the stands I hear the deep
Immeasurable roar

Of multitudes who feel again
The fierce delights of those who saw
The Coliseum black with men,
And know the sudden awe

That grips the throat with doubt and dread,
Till the wild tension of the fight
Turns it to frantic faith instead,
And blurs both sound and sight.

The crews, and the river a crystal flood.
The splash and tumult of the start:
Long slow clean strokes that send the blood
Like music to the heart.

Lithe runners on the cinder-track,
Awaited by a breathless throng;
Off like a flash at the pistol-crack
And running keen and strong.

And riotous evenings in the Yard,
When hundreds snake-danced on the green;
When the dark elms were fiery starred
And the moon laughed between.

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

And silent wondrous winter nights
With book and pipe before the fire,
When the world set itself to rights,
And Heaven seemed somehow nigher.

And Spring, when newly wakened earth
Tempted from duties to the quest:
Each morning was a greater birth,
Each night was sweeter rest. . .

Now faces older, more sedate:
The masters, serving each his cause
Of learning, careless of debate,
And censure, or applause;

Lords in the sacrosanct domain
Of knowledge, quick to see and share
New realms of thought or garnered gain
With wisdom's poorest heir.

Now close friends, and the loyalty
That sought and bound us each to each:
The mirth that baffles memory;
The love that stifles speech.

And some, the faces of a few
Whose brows wore like a mystic wreath
A radiance over eyes that knew
So soon the dusk of death.

O sun, be bright above each grave:
Be light upon each grave, O rain:
The grief is past, and Life that gave
Has taken them again. . .

A little time . . . how sweet it seems
To sit in silence on the verge
Of fact and fancy-foolish dreams.
Where pain and pleasure merge

But leave a mocking memory,
Elusive, pale, and bitter-sweet,
Of deeds that never are to be,
Of passions incomplete...

So the months cluster into years:
The few short years, half-sad, half-gay,
Which lend the glory that endears
These passing hours to-day.

A moment more we feel, above
The joy, beneath the pain, again
The mighty arms of Her we love—
Mother of Souls of Men.

But out in the morning men go by,
Cheerily, wearily, swift or slow—
Into the morning you and I
Fling wide Her gates, and go...

Up from the valleys and over the hills
And on and on to the mountain height,
The highway beckons, and morning fills
Each with the old delight...

Who would falter for doubts or fears?
Who would linger an hour to-day?
Into the light of the years—the years—
Up, and out, and away!

Loud lifted from the myriad throngs
That crowd the highways of the earth,
Come tumults and triumphant songs
That drown our little mirth:

The songs of labour and desire
And deeds and destinies of men:
New songs, whose harmonies shall fire
High words of tongue and pen:—

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

Of glorious eyes, of singing hands
Whose motion is a psalm of praise;
Of arms that bind the earth with bands
That scorn the strength of days;

Of love exulting in man's lips;
Of truth that glories in his brain;
Of art that crowds his finger-tips
With boundless bliss and pain.

The earth is rent at his decree;
The winds are harnessed to his will;
He rules the ragings of the sea,
He speaks, and it is still.

The heavens declare his majesty:
The all-embracing aether speaks
His thought, and flings it through the sky
Forth to the farthest peaks.

The ages are his heritage:
The planets flame a little span:
Time scrawls a moment on the page
Which is the heart of man.

All petty faith, all little creeds
That pander to a servile past;
All fears that serve forgotten needs;
All hopeless hope, amassed

By men who cowered to the earth,
Who viewed the void with sidelong gaze;
Who bribed their gods with mirthless mirth
And gifts of praiseless praise—

These he has banished, and he stands,
Man, the exultant lord, whose strife
Has given him heart and sturdy hands
That have laid hold on life.

CLASS POEM

Where lies the realm he cannot share?
In hells of blinded industry,
In heavens of beauty, he is there:
His dreams are verity...

But through the moan of whistles comes,
The sound of traffic's throb and roar—
A sound like dim and distant drums
Marshalling men to war.

I hear it mounting from the throngs
That crowd the highways of the earth:
Beneath their psalms are bitter songs;
Beneath their plenty, dearth.

The plangent cities reek and smoke,
And night is painted with a glare
That mocks the livid lightning stroke
And fills the heavy air

With portents of tremendous doom
As screaming locomotives leap
Down the black avenues of gloom,
Down to the fields of sleep.

Titanic forges blast the hills;
The plains are raucous marts of trade;
The valleys shriek with mighty mills;
And men are sore afraid,

And lift their pleading hands to One
To save them from the greed of men.—
By the dark streams of Babylon
Their cry goes up again.

By the dark waters of despair
Men, broken, bruised, and bleeding, lie:
By the dark waters of despair
They blaspheme life, and die.

For Babylon is built anew—
A city of masters and of slaves—
Giving Her treasures to the few,
And to the many, graves.

The dead She rifles in the tomb;
The dying in Her marts are sold;
Children are purchased in the womb:
And Christ cries as of old

To them that buy and sell at ease,
His warning: "Inasmuch as ye
Have done it to the least of these,
Ye did it unto Me."

The agony, and bloody sweat,
The cross, the passion, and the tomb—
Men see the Christ of Olivet
At mill and mart and loom.

But still they clutch their hoarded sums
And answer with the words of Cain:
"Am I my brother's keeper?" comes
The lying taunt again...

Peace...till the masters of the earth
Have read the writings on the wall:
Dumb shall be all their idle mirth
When the dread terrors fall.

Peace...till the fields their sickles reap
Have borne the fearful aftermath,
When like hot lavas down the steep
Roll the red waves of wrath...

Peace...let them come, if come they must,
The days of trembling and dull fear.
Our sons shall count them but as dust
That cumbers yesteryear...

CLASS POEM

Light crashes from the pits of change,
And blinding burning splendor runs
Through all the gamuts of the strange
New universe, and stuns

The sense with mighty things destroyed,
As dark-consuming thoughts are hurled
Like shards of chaos through the void,
Forth to a waiting world...

What men have dared, shall we not dare?
What men have done, shall we not do?
What men must share, shall we not share?
Shall not our hearts be true?

To-morrow we are of the throngs
That crowd the highways of the earth,
And victory must shape our songs,
And love, and might, and mirth:

The songs of labour and desire,
Of far-off deeds and destinies:
Songs whose glad hope shall be as fire
To light all mysteries...

What men have dared, our souls must dare:
What men have done, our hands must do:
What men must share, our lives will share—
The terrible, the new.

For ever we shall feel, above
The joy, below the grief, again
The mighty arms of Her we love—
Mother of Souls of Men. .

Up from the valleys and over the hills
And on and on to the mountain height,
The highways beckon, and morning thrills
Each with a new delight...

Out in the morning, men go by,
 Cheerily, wearily, sad or gay—
Into the morning, you and I
 Merrily march away...

Who would falter for doubts or fears?
 Who would pause for the passing show?
Out of the years—into the years—
 Fling wide the gates, and go!

IVY ORATION

FRANK WILLIAM SULLIVAN.

MR. FIRST MARSHAL, MEMBERS OF THE GRADUATING CLASS OF 1910, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

Congratulations! As I enter upon this mournful duty, so recently forced upon me, I extend to you all my heart-felt congratulations upon the happy circumstances that bring us here in joyful assembly.

MR. FIRST MARSHAL, I congratulate you on the great honor that has been yours in presenting me as the Speaker of the Day. How well my modesty becomes my youth!

You, Members of 1910, I congratulate. With finals vanquished, the Jordan passed, we gather here as full-fledged seniors to spite the faculty with our rejoicings. You sit here indeed as living evidence of the great truth—that Harvard never turned out a gentleman. She keeps them—right through to graduation. But not so much on your four years of intellectual effort do I feel you open to felicitations as upon your speedy recuperation from the senior picnic. That fact alone bespeaks a capacity in you that may well be used in ever greater efforts. We should also rejoice upon our full quota on this occasion. Every one is present, and luckily, too, for without the “1” the class of ’10 would be “0.” But chiefly are we fortunate that it was foreordained for ages that we in our brilliancy should go forth into the world to display our radiance at just the time that Halley’s comet is lost from sight. And thereby hangs a tale. Gentlemen, your happy faces, so full of the joy of intelligent living, loudly proclaim the fact that while Providence in Its infinite power might have made a better Class than 1910, It never did.

To you Fathers and Mothers we acknowledge the deep sense of pleasure we feel at your presence here with us. We rejoice that we have been able to assist you in attaining that Matterhorn of all the range of earthly joys of seeing your sons depart into the ripe and active field of human endeavor.

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

Much of what we are today and much of what we ever shall be we owe to none but you. For all this we feel deeply grateful and here make public manifestation of our gratitude. May the day be for you one of soul-satisfying jubilation.

Young ladies, your scintillating beauty impels me to rejoice with you at your comely appearance. It was suggested last year that in your honor we name this "Lass" Day, but through errors of others the announcements were misprinted. Seniors, this array of beauty about us moves me to revert to you again with the warning that you of the tender hearts may well remember the admonition of the Father of His Country who spoke to us of foreign powers in the words, "Maintain friendship for all, and tangling alliances with none." Young ladies, despite this warning you will find us a most engaging set of fellows, but please do not practice your wiles too persistently today lest you jeopardize our qualifications for the Bachelor's degree next Wednesday. You will today be the subject of many taunts and charged with inconsistencies, but pray take it all in the spirit of the day. O Girls, Girls, Girls, though you have for ages been the one great riddle of the universe, we'll never give you up. To all of which I know you answer, "Ah-Men."

You bachelors we also congratulate. You know it is told that Lafayette, the sagacious Frenchman, once inquired of the status of two young men. "Are you married, my friend?" he asked of one. "Yes, sir, I am," came the answer. "Fortunate man. Fortunate man," rejoined Lafayette; and turning to the other asked of him, "Are you married?" "No, sir, I am not," was his reply. "Lucky dog," snapped Lafayette. Gentlemen bachelors, we congratulate you.

And to all our graduates, whether from the African home of the uncouth lion or from the American home of the dandelion, we extend our heartfelt welcome.

Have I forgotten anyone, that is, outside of the lower classes?

But why all these people? Oh yes: you have come to hear the Ivy Oration. Your hosts saw an inseparable connection between an Ivy and a spread. But what is that institution,—the Ivy? There have been as many reasons advanced for its origin as there are leaves on the vine itself. No, ladies, the Ivy Oration is not forced upon the only member of the Senior class who retains the verdant hue of his Freshman year all through his college course. Do not judge from appearances. Some orators have found in the Ivy Oration a recurrence to the days when Ivy was planted near the favorite building of the departing class, and have delivered speeches in that inspiration which have made their auditors green with envy—of those who stayed at home. Still others have found in the Ivy Oration an excuse for humor, and their audiences have fairly laughed at their efforts. It is a fact, nevertheless, that there must have been some humor in those gentlemen, for three of my predecessors in this office proved themselves so dry that they were later made professors in our College. But the Goddess of Fortune has waited to crown you with her favors. It has been left to you, kind people, to hear the only true Ivy. Former speakers never had the true nature of the Ivy vouchsafed them; they knew no more about it than does the Dean about our “cuts.” The Ivy Oration in its true and evident nature, as its very name implies, must be a rambling talk.

But even in his rambles one must be cautious of his footsteps. I might well hesitate to make light with talk, before this body, so heavy with frowns, to dare utter a sound without a friend within earshot; but surrounded, as I am, by these my stately columns, I may proceed securely to the task I might otherwise approach with a sense of fear and trembling.

I am like a preacher without a text, but for that reason do not lose yourselves in slumber. To be sure, a history of our group would be appropriate on this our show day, but discretion prevents my boring my hearers beyond the point of endurance by repeating what is already well known to every educated person in America,—the deeds and fame of the Class of 1910 of Harvard University. It needs no extolling; in fact no mortal tongue or pen could pay it sufficient homage. Clearly then it would not be wise for me to unearth any passages of your college life which might be disagreeable for you gentlemen to hear, and which would deliver you over heavily shackled to your justly angry parents. Do not appear so surprised, friends, at this hinted revelation; these are mortar boards we boys are wearing, and not haloes.

“The greatest wits,” says Dean Swift, “love to strike at the highest objects.” Clearly then, I must proceed to demolish athletics. The prominence that sports occupy in our curriculum will be readily attested next Wednesday when some of us win our degrees, A.B. “Bachelors of Athletics.”

Football in our day has seen many vicissitudes. Rough in its tactics at our entrance to College, the faculty brought about many molly-coddling modifications in the play, but lately, the arch turncoats, they put the indelible stamp of their approval on the old style of contest by adopting as the emblem of this University—The Blood color.

Wonder of wonders, hear ye all, Harvard defeated Yale once in football during our presence here. The Elis did their best to beat us that year, but found themselves stuck on a big, sharp Burr. “But, be that as it may,” only last fall under the apt leadership of Captain Fish our team went swimmingly through the season until it became so entangled in the heavy line of that Coy Fisherman from New Haven on a bar of Yale sand. Still, our ultimate victory over Yale in football is only a question of time,—that is, of more time at the end of a half when our scoring seems imminent. And again, if we could only have something inserted into the new football rules that would make it a felony to cross our goal line, the monotony of Yale victories might be broken.

As for the national sport as played here, the base features connected with that game, the cowardly practices it encourages of hitting and running, make it a sport to engage in which one might well feel “put out.”

However, I regret to mention it, only one feature mars our prospect of future success in our track games. I have been requested by the college office to deny a rumor now current. President Lowell will not coach the track team next season.

IVY ORATION

Ah, but our crew; there's the thing. These boys have recently fallen in—this is not a drowning accident, ladies—these boys have recently fallen into the habit of winning. Two successive victories over Yale on a four-mile course and another one to come in a few days, show our taste for water. To be sure, we may lost at two miles to Cornell, but we accept that purely as a matter of course. We know that our oarsmen are not “short sports.”

Basketball is dead. “Requiescat in pace.”

Will the gentleman back there in the middle row kindly lay aside his newspaper and see me at the end of the lecture?

“The next thing to observe is that,” though we have been consistent in athletics—that is consistent in winning some sports and losing others, we do display one beautiful inconsistency. Look at our songs. In these Yale is always the objective regardless of our actual opponent. Brown comes here to play us football and we lustily proceed to tell those boys that, “There's never an Eli can teach us to play,” and Brown naturally takes advantage of our stupidity in learning. We further tell them of “the funeral ode we sing to Eli Yale,” and forget the obsequies Brown holds over our bodies. Dartmouth runs onto the field, but, entirely oblivious of their presence, we let the spectators know that “We'll show the sons of Eli that the Crimson still holds sway.” And when victory over these foes turns our way we, in our color blindness, mistake the Green for the Blue, and rejoice in happy tune that “poor Eli's hopes we are dashing into Blue obscurity.” Oh Muse of Song, Oh Maiden fair, pray give us but one offering for all contingencies. We of 1910 have surely seen its need.

On the matter of societies I shall not be secret. This year, as usual, The I. O. U. fraternity has the largest membership. The Memorial Society again tried to leave its mark in the College, but failed. But just to show you how flighty some college boys can be, a few of us founded an Aeronautical Society. Not wishing in any way to encroach upon the territory of Wilbur Wright, I must agree with him that our alleged aviators here in college have proved themselves veritable parrots—“the best of talkers, the worst of flyers." Not long ago I found one of the officers of that Body examining a flying buttress in the yard. Clearly, then, the only way for this Society to retrieve itself is to obtain a license from the highway commission to construct a new wing on the Law School. However, we have many laudable associations here at college. Why, there's the newly-formed Total Abstinence Society. I shouldn't think of throwing cold water on them; it might prove too great a novelty.

Fellows, 1910 has had many opportunities for happiness. But undoubtedly the most fondly cherished of all these memories—and here kindly credit me with one moment's seriousness—the most fondly cherished of all these memories is that we have enjoyed a privilege not accorded a senior class for nearly a full half century, that of attending the inauguration of a president of this University. We regretted the departure of the able and beloved Dr. Eliot from that office; we rejoice at his continued activity in the public welfare. We congratulate ourselves and the classes to follow on the election of that man in wisdom, that boy in spirit, President Lowell. Fellows, I know you join me when I drink long life to the departed, and long life to the present incumbent.

This is a large University of ours: Too large in fact. Why, some of us are no more than mere patches on this Seat of Learning. Look at our various departments. There's our Scientific School, where grease-begrimed students saturate themselves with thoughts poetic; there's the Medical School, the only department with truly "stiff" courses; and, I regret to mention it, our Dental School. In that department they absolutely deny the teachings of the rest of our University, for instead of inculcating in their students independence and self-reliance, they regard as the best means to professional success a well developed "pull." And the students of that department realize the shame that attaches to them, for they go about their work, not like the members of our Law School, light of heart and finger, but constantly "looking down in the mouth." But you will be glad to learn, I know, that in this institution there is one redeeming feature—the Divinity School. Of late we have seen much agitation for new chemical laboratories. Gross extravagance! Everyone of us has seen ample proof of the fact that the lecture system already gives sufficient opportunity for “gas analysis.”

“Art,” says Stevenson, “consists in leaving out things.” In my desire then to gratify the hopes of one of my friends, expressed on the march down here, today, that I prove myself an artist, I find myself constrained to omit many of the remarks I had thought appropriate on this occasion. But already I see you looking down upon my humble efforts. You must be weary. Even the Sun makes manifest his fatigue by going to rest. I would that I might talk to you here for hours, but time wears on. And what does it wear? Why, the close of day. But most of all, it would be a serious reflection upon the professor who taught me railroad economics here at school did I not display some idea of terminal facilities.

Fellows, for four years we have lived, and loved, and loafed together. Despite the ordeal we underwent this morning at Sanders Theatre, where the alleged Orator and Poet held forth, our life has been a happy one. We have accomplished some things of our own accord; in others we have been supported, for there is not one among us who has not at some time or other been held up by that stalwart pair of “suspenders,” Deans Hurlbut and Castle. During our visit to the Spring of Learning some of us have drunk deeply; most of us lost our dippers. Nevertheless we all learned the meaning of “college bred”—“a four years’ loaf.” Or, better still, it’s the showing we make on the dough that we raised. We might have worked harder; we could not have been happier. Oh! the tender memories that we cherish of those seats in Gore, and the feelings we hold from time in Memorial, will remain with us always. Today our lives end—(that is, our class lives end) in a whirl of food and feathers. Tomorrow our class will be scattered to the four winds of the Earth, never again to assemble with full ranks. But before we go, let me wish you, from this station to which you have raised me, that whatever may be your future occupation, whether you are lawyers or make an honest living, whether you work in a bank or work your friends, whether you earn your living or become a college professor, whether you remain single or take grave chances with your happiness, whether you drive a Packard or drive a Taxi, whether you do good or do time, you may always be as happy as you have been at Harvard. Plant deep, then, in your hearts the Ivy of these memories; nourish them well. "Be good and you will be happy." Do this for the greater glory of Nineteen Hundred and Ten.

CLASS ODE

THOMAS STEARNS ELIOT.

For the hour that is left us, Fair Harvard, with thee,
Ere we face the importunate years,
In thy shadow we wait, while thy presence dispels
Our vain hesitations and fears.
And we turn as thy sons ever turn, in the strength
Of the hopes that thy blessings bestow,
From the hopes and ambitions that sprang at thy feet
To the thoughts of the past as we go.

Yet for all of these years that tomorrow has lost
We are still the less able to grieve,
With so much that of Harvard we carry away
In the place of the life that we leave.
And only the years that efface and destroy
Give us also the vision to see
What we owe for the future, the present, and past,
Fair Harvard, to thine and to thee.

THE GOOD THAT HENRY THE EIGHTH DID.

J. ELMER CATES.

Four hundred years ago Henry the Eighth was just beginning his long reign. The accepted character of this second Tudor represents him as an odious and sensuous monster. In the desire of some writers to blacken him we can find no room for a sober examination of his career. The good that Henry did is too often totally obscured. Nor is it difficult for a biased writer to make out a bad case against England's most uxorious king. Facts may be summoned in plentiful array to substantiate almost every charge. And yet when the heat of discussion passes, one is prone to inquire how so wicked a king could have reigned so long and have died in bed with his boots off. The age of Cesare Borgia and Machiavelli was not excessively fond of human life, and it used many dark means in disposing of hated sovereigns. Moreover English history itself is replete with cases where an unpopular king was forced from his throne.

When I speak of the good Henry did, I shall have in mind only those acts and measures which have had a profound and lasting influence on English life. It may be admitted that most of the good Henry did was not intended as such, while much of the good he planned to do failed of its purpose. If England today is the foremost nation on this planet, has the most admirable constitutional system, is a center of the highest enlightenment, it must be that her present position rests upon the actions of great men in her past. She must have stood at various times at a parting of the way; and her wise selections may be traced through generations.

England certainly faced a momentous crisis during the reign of Henry the Eighth. All Europe shortly after he ascended his regal seat was thrown into a vast agitation by the thunders of liberty reverberating from Wittenberg where mighty Luther turned directly to God and the Scriptures for heavenly inspiration. Henry opposed the new movement with all his accustomed vigor, and his zeal was rewarded by the Pope with that magnificent title, "Defender of the Faith." Nor must we forget that Henry lived and died a Catholic. He maintained the old service and theology. His great step toward tearing England from the Papacy lay in his rejection of the Pope as supreme head of the English church. This drastic action was caused directly by the failure of the Pope to grant Henry a divorce from Katherine of Aragon. While we admit the pernicious influence of divorce, still when we remember that this divorce was refused on political grounds, we may understand why Henry used political means to retaliate. Pope Clement the Seventh was under the thumb of Charles the Fifth, who at that time was an enemy of England. Royal divorces were uncommon. Henry's own sister, Queen Margaret of Scotland, secured a divorce with the church's consent on grounds no more laudable than those of her brother.

But what to Henry started as a purely personal affair became a national question with speed. He may have been captivated by Anne Boleyn, but he also had an intense desire for a male heir. No queen had ever yet reigned in England. The famous divorce caused the separation of state and Papacy which has continued till this day. Henry would have no outside interference, and thus he paved the way for that splendid insular independence which has been an asset of the world down to our time.

Henry was, in the second place, a great constitutionalist, although this is a paradox. Again the good resulting came from a negative source. The English king got his nation bound up in his own quarrels. Parliament, under him, became a mere registering machine, but its acts were legal. It is a glory of England that while Europe was plunged under a deluge of blood then and later over the religious question, that England united under a strong monarch passed through the storm with scarcely a thousand lives lost. Think of the Netherlands, of the religious wars in France, of the Thirty Years War, and then if it be good for a nation to preserve its choicest blood and not spill it in violent civil strife, what a supreme good England enjoyed! Henry set the example of making Parliament a partner, and Elizabeth when most successful followed the same policy.

Henry the Eighth, like most of the monarchs of history, needed more money than he found at his disposal. The rich monasteries seemed to him suitable objects for spoliation, and they were accordingly dissolved. Even in this bold robbery he tried to appear legal. He had charges of immorality trumped up against them. Only the most favored of the monastic institutions were suffered to remain unmolested. The lands and properties of the others were sold or given away to those sturdy men of the middle classes who later overturned the unpopular Stuarts. But long before the Stuart revolutions they performed a great though unintended service to England. Under Mary they refused to surrender their church property, and England was not reunited with Rome. The Pope demanded the ecclesiastical lands, but the practical Englishman preferred his broad fields to any religious comfort he might obtain for giving up property of a dubious title.

Such were a few of the good results coming from Henry's reign. We may hate his injustice, his egotism and vanity; we may show that nearly everything he did was temporarily wrong; but still he stands, strong, wilful, persistent—a monarch in every respect. Such a firm hand is precisely what England needed. His father, Henry the Seventh, had barely time enough allotted to him to bring order from the chaos of the Wars of the Roses. Henry the Eighth took the scepter and brought upon his nation wealth and power. If Henry was a constitutionalist at the same time he was a despot, he was also a democrat while a haughty aristocrat, for he founded his power on popularity. That is the secret of Tudor success,—popularity. He was able to do as he did and to cause such far-reaching effects because his measures never clashed with the real welfare of the nation. The broader interests of England were not injured. Henry was born and bred an Englishman and he made England English. It is not surprising then that his nation upheld him in harsh measures when they saw one of their number enforcing their own peculiar ideals, enjoying their own amusements and advancing English influence abroad. Many previous kings were kings of portions of the realm. Henry was monarch of his whole kingdom, a vigorous, selfish, but truly patriotic ruler.

THE PROMETHEAN GIFT.

WILLIAM KISTLER HUFF.

The last century brought no advance so great as that in medicine, the art of healing was completely revolutionized; but every advance met determined opposition. Prejudice and superstition united against Jenner and his successors.

At the present time Science encounters no opposition so bitter as that of the anti-vivisectionists. They call animal experimentation "hellish deeds done in the name of science," the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research "Halls of Agony" and "Hell at Close Range," and they have asked the state to close it as a disgrace to the age we live in. They load upon the surgeons all the vile names possible to fluent vocabularies, and have introduced in the National Congress and the Legislatures of various states bills to limit research and experimentation. They charge that vivisection brutalizes the investigator, depicting in glowing terms how "this cult of educated demons," by courtesy called physicians, gloat over the horrible tortures they inflict upon the helpless creatures strapped to their operating tables. And yet Robert Louis Stevenson wrote "The physician is the flower of our civilization, generosity, cheerfulness, courage, and sympathy he has in greater degree than anyone else." And one of the most distinguished of the New England clergy says "There is no finer, more tender, truer set of men on this earth than the surgeons; tender and humane in our homes, the hospitals and the laboratories."

HARVARD, 1910 — CLASS REPORT

Throughout the last century yellow fever was the most dreaded scourge of the tropics; it took its annual toll of thousands. Ten years ago a cure was discovered and yellow fever is now a vanquished foe. Human beings alone are subject to it and in consequence animal experimentation was impossible, but the physicians did not hesitate. With masterly courage, with heroic self-sacrifice, they inoculated themselves and underwent the most revolting experiences; some of them recovered, some of them died, but they conquered the disease. At last the head of that corps of physicians wrote to his wife, "The prayer that has been mine for twenty years, that I might be permitted in some way or at some time to do something to alleviate human suffering, has been granted." Was that man brutalized by his contact with suffering? That is the prayer of the physician, not of one only, but of all, to be permitted to do something to alleviate human suffering.

The most horrible cruelties possible are perpetrated upon defenceless dogs and monkeys by this "cult of educated demons," such is the charge; but the official medical statistics show that ninety-seven per cent of the animals used are anesthetized or merely inoculated, only three per cent feel any pain greater than that of a pin-prick, none suffer needless cruelty. The foes of vivisection assert that most of the experiments are made solely out of shameless curiosity, yet it is this very curiosity, this overwhelming desire

"To follow knowledge like a sinking star

Beyond the utmost bound of human thought,"

which has enabled the investigator to penetrate the deepest lair of the germs that fight for man's destruction, to slay them, and conquer disease.

The anti-vivisectionists reverently quote, or misquote, "distinguished physicians" in opposition to animal experimentation. Many of these graduates in medicine have devoted their time to pursuits other than those for which they were educated. One has achieved distinction as an archaeologist, a second as a literary critic, a third as a politician, a fourth, a woman, as a novelist. Some of those quoted have disowned the sentiments attributed to them.

DISQUISITIONS

others could not come back from the grave to affirm or deny them. Almost unanimously the practising physicians and surgeons agree with Doctor Osler that in the last fifty years animal experimentation has done more to emancipate medicine than all the work of all the physicians from Hippocrates to Jenner; and he adds "We are but on the threshold."

The anti-vivisectionists defy the physician to prove that animal experimentation has benefited humanity, and the physician proves incontestably that it has. He does more, he proves that it has greatly benefited the lower animals, for it has taught us how to cure cattle plague, splenic fever, chicken cholera, swine plague, and other diseases. Huxley says that vivisection in a few years saved to France animals worth the five milliards of the Prussian War indemnity. This it has done for animals. What has it done for man? It has recreated physiology and pathology; it has reduced the mortality in ovariectomy from thirty-five per cent to one; it has taught us how to cure diseases of the brain which were hopeless before; and has reduced the death rate in puerperal fever from seventy-five per cent to less than one per cent. Antitoxin, discovered solely through animal experimentation, has reduced the mortality in diphtheria to one-fourth of the former rate. There is no need of recounting here the romantic story of vaccination, and the millions of lives it has saved in the last hundred years. Even today it has opponents, who tell a lurid tale of the horrible diseases it has caused, but the abandoning of the arm-to-arm method of inoculation wiped out the last vestige of truth in the charge. Animal experimentation made asepsis possible, blood poisoning, erysipelas, lockjaw, and gangrene have almost been driven out, and the mortality in surgical operations has dropped from sixty per cent to five. The world-wide crusade against tuberculosis, which has already produced such striking results, is wholly dependent upon knowledge gained through animal experimentation. In his discovery of a cure for cerebrospinal meningitis Doctor Flexner of the Rockefeller Institute used twenty-five monkeys and a hundred guinea pigs, and in two years five hundred lives have been saved, the attendant paralysis and idiocy have been wiped out, and the mortality has dropped from eighty per cent to twenty. Does vivisection pay?

And yet Lewis Carroll, English clergyman and author, wrote "In vivisection the lessening of human suffering is a mere dummy set up to amuse sentimental dreamers. The surgeons maintain that humanity is so much more important than the brute world that inflicting pain and death upon animals in the hope of lessening human suffering, is justified. Few, even in an age where selfishness has almost become a religion, dare openly avow a selfishness so hideous as this." Only a few years ago diphtheria was nearly always fatal, physician, father, and mother stood by, helpless, as the child slowly strangled. Who shall measure in terms of dogs and guinea pigs the worth of the lives that have been saved from diphtheria alone, the anguish and sorrow that have been spared? If medicine is to advance, vivisection must be continued. Slowly but surely it is teaching us how to cure infantile paralysis, diseases of the heart, cancer, and countless other human ills. "We are but on the threshold."

Thomas Jefferson wrote to Jenner, the discoverer of vaccination, "You have erased from the calendar of human afflictions one of the greatest. Yours is the comfortable reflection that mankind can never forget that you have lived. Future generations will know by history alone that the loathsome smallpox has existed and by you been extirpated." And the same future generations will realize with Doctor Osler that research and experimentation have been the distinguishing characteristic of advance in medicine, the Promethean gift of the nineteenth century to man.
